Trade Agreement (KORUS) to “clarify” that it should be a limited FTA that covers trade but not labour, environment or services. But South Korea says that while it could agree to cover those issues, it would not agree to be limited to anything. The

US, for its part, wants a deal that gives it some ability to retaliate against the steel imports of South Korea and others, particularly China, that are believed to harm US industries. It is also trying to limit the number of Korean firms that could open a business on the Korean market, due to the failure of its KORUS to make inroads into the steel market. The US has also been talking up the case of national security, linking the steel issue with moves by South Korea to develop its own, advanced fighter jet. But the discussions are “going nowhere”, as one US business negotiator put it, according to Bloomberg. “Just don’t know why,” the negotiator said. “We’re wasting everyone’s time... Maybe we should just agree to disagree,” he said. He said that negotiators have given up on trying to force a decision to open the KORUS to other issues. The lack of progress comes as negotiators seek to sign off on a formal determination of the negotiations’ outcomes, due to be complete next month. That determination will say whether the deal has been concluded, whether the US and South Korea need to start negotiations to modernise the agreement, and whether the US has an obligation to extend the deal for four years. The US and South Korea
